Dear Sarah,

The COVID-19 outbreak has had a profound effect on how communities throughout the country connect. What does civic participation look like during a time of social distancing? What are the trends and opportunities for cities, planners, and technologists as they seek to engage residents and support civic participation?

Tomorrow, on the next episode of Coast to Coast, we're chatting with technologist Mona Sloane, and Warren Flood, Microsoft's corporate affairs manager for Detroit. They'll provide insight on how the pandemic has affected civic life.

(Tuesday, July 7, 1 p.m. ET)

Mona Sloane, PHD, is a NYU-based sociologist working on inequality in the context of AI design and policy. She frequently publishes and speaks about AI, ethics, equitability and policy in a global context. She is a technology fellow at NYU's

Alliance for Public Interest and fellow at the Institute for Public Knowledge, as well as adjunct professor at the Tandon School of Engineering. Warren Flood works with civic leaders, community stakeholders, and the citizens they serve to tackle urban challenges by leveraging Microsoft's resources to empower people and organizations in Detroit to achieve more. Prior to joining Microsoft, Warren ran a data analytics consulting firm.
