Sarah,

New research shows us that Americans have vastly different perceptions on discrimination and racism in our country. What factors drive these differences in perception? How do these divergent and increasingly polarized realities play out in American communities? How can we work to bridge these divides?

On Wednesday at 12 p.m. ET, please join us for a live conversation on race and polarization in America, driven by two recent studies by More in Common and the American Enterprise Institute's Survey Center on American Life. We'll hear from leading thinkers on race and community as we explore how to address these divisions across America.
